VARSITY MAY BUILD COVERED RINK NEXT YEAR

Plan to Provide Finances Adopted To Cost $20,000

The possibility of a covered rink for Varsity will in all probability be a reality by next December. At a meeting of the student's union held on Monday a scheme to provide finances for the construction of the rink was adopted.

A year ago a committee was appointed by the union to consider the idea of a covered rink. The committee has since been working on the plan. In order to raise money, the board of governors of the university has been requested to issue debentures to the amount required. It was estimated that this debt would be paid in three years. The risk will be controlled by a directors' committee, representative of the students and of the administration.

Clarence Campbell in presenting the plan to the union, which is the committee behind the plan, said that the rink would be a financial success. It would be a covered rink, and it would be a rink for the use of the students. The rink would be a rink for the use of the students. The rink would be a rink for the use of the students.

A SIGN OF WARNING

As Cassin Baba fell dead, the robbers gathered about their leader and stood awaiting his command. He considered for a time, planning what was best to do. At last, he spoke.

"We can not tell how many of the dead man's comrades share his secret," said he. "But we must warn the others that if they come to this cave, death will be the penalty."

THESE WOMEN

BEGIN HERE TODAY

All that Buffalo gossip has learned about HARRY MORTON, in the fifteen years that he has lived there, is that he is rich, attractive, middle-aged and unmarried, and that he lives with his adopted daughter, ATHEL.

ATHEL is an expensive house, maintaining also an apartment in New York, where he visits nearly every week. They never have learned what his business is.

A man, whom Morton calls SMITH, appears after an absence of eighteen years, Smith claims to be Andrew Smith, Morton hurries him off to a job in South America.

NOMA, a beautiful girl in New York, has been Morton's mother girl acquaintance, and with her father's aid, she has been able to trap him in a "bachelor" game with the aid of a stage set and man. She breaks down, out-fours her part in it and comes to his apartment to plead for forgiveness.

She encounters Andrew, tells her that she loves Morton and Andrew, then confesses that she herself loves Morton, and wants to marry him. Morton stops the resulting quarrel abruptly, and makes Andrew take breakfast with Noma and him. They take Noma home, and he goes to his office, where he is informed that a man is awaiting him on important business.

NOW GO ON WITH THE STORY

CHAPTER VIII

AT Morton's order, a tall, sturdy young man was ushered into his office. Morton arose and said cordially:

"Hello, Parrish. Your first name is John, isn't it?"

The young man assented, as they shook hands. "I was told to come here and report to you this morning," he explained. "Your secretary in Buffalo sent yesterday morning telephoned me, told me about it, and said I'd better come down here. Morton sat down, and explained Parrish in a chair. Just as he said, "I expected you to come in a few days, but I had no other place for that. You can't come here, can't you? I'm sorry."

He swung around a round desk behind him, opened it, and took from a pigeon-hole a newspaper. Glancing over it rapidly, he read some of the morning news. "John Parrish, twenty-four years of age—had to quit college to support his ailing father—worked day and night, and studied throughout his spare time—was a brilliant student—What kind of fellow are you, smook?"

Parrish colored, and told him "But if you object to my smoking, I'm willing to quit," he said.

"I don't care if you smoke," Morton said. "Smoking is a habit, and I planned it. I merely wanted to know if I would be able to borrow your kind of tobacco from you from time to time. But if not, don't smoke that stuff."

The young man drew from his pocket a tobacco pipe, and studied it intently.

"This was pretty good," he said.

"Every man should be a tobacco pipe," commented Morton. "But taste in tobacco and women and climate, vary."

He went on reading the paper. The young man watched him attentively. When Morton was done, he folded the paper and put it back in his desk.

Parrish, he said, "that report describes pretty much the sort of secretary I was looking for. I have a man that stays up too late at night because his father has to be in good condition. He must be the perfect offspring of a good and prosperous family because he probably wouldn't work. I see you drive a fiver, and that's all right. It will help keep your mind off your other troubles."

The young man, with a slight searching eye, looked over his new employee. Then he tapped his pencil on the desk, thoughtfully. "I have a case, that has just come to my mind," he said. "You see, I've been thinking about my head, relative to."

Then he leaned in close, and Morton told him, "Do you play any kind of musical instrument?"

Morton again shook his head.

"What instrument?" asked Morton.

"I don't know," Morton said.

"The young man looked puzzled. 'What shall I take?' he asked."

Morton laughed. "No, I should not advise a fiver, then. I should tell you all right, that one of the best there is, and cheap. It is so."

Parrish's expression was divided between amusement and appreciation.

"Would you mind telling me, why you want me to do these things? They aren't a regular sort of a secretary's work, are they?"

Morton's eyes twinkled, but he answered the question seriously. "I have the idea—I'm willing to tell you. You have heard of my adopted daughter, Andrew?"
